

LAGERS

A lager is a beer that is produced with a bottom fermenting yeast strain. In general, lagers are fermented at cooler temperatures (40-50 F) and for a longer period of time (4 to 6 weeks) than ales. Most bottom fermenting yeast strains do not produce flavor or aroma altering compounds commonly found in ales, so the characteristics of lagers are usually straightforward, and come mostly from malt and hops. Like ales, lagers can range dramatically in color from straw-gold to black, and can be found with a huge variance in strength, from 0.5% ABV to more than 12% ABV

TRAPPISTS

A Trappist beer is a beer that is brewed by or under control of Trappist monks. One of the world's 171 Trappist monasteries (as of April 2005), seven produce beer (six in Belgium and one in the Netherlands). Only these seven breweries are authorized to label their beers with the AUTHENTIC TRAPPIST PRODUCT logo that indicates a compliance to various rules edicted by the International Trappist Association

ALES

An ale is a beer that is produced with a top fermenting yeast strain. In general, ales are fermented at warmer temperatures (60-70F) and for a shorter period of time (2-3 weeks) than lagers. Most top fermenting yeast strains produce phenols, which impart spicy undertones to a beer, and esters, which provide fruity characteristics. Like lagers, ales can range dramatically in color from straw-gold to black, and can be found with a huge variance in strength, from 0.5% ABV to more than 12% ABV

Lambics are unique in that they are "spontaneously" fermented using wild, airborne yeast. These beers are produced in an area of Southwest Brussels called the Pajottenland, and in the case of Cantillon, within the city of Brussels. These beers will age anywhere from 18 months to 3 years in oak barrels before they are bottled, or kegged for consumption.

CIDERS

Cider is the natural, expressed juice from apples. Hard cider undergoes a natural fermentation process, which yields an alcoholic juice. It has a fruity flavor and a varying degree of taste from very sweet to tart. Additionally, it is often effervescent due to the activity of the natural yeasts present.
